The St. Louis Manual training school is an interesting experiment. The first class of twenty-eight is about completing the three years' course. They have made three steam engines, doing all the work from the drawings to the final touch. This education of the hands has not been accomplished at the sacrifice of the clucation of the head, as only two hours of each day are devoted for manual labor. The course extends over three years, during which time they become skilled draughtemen and gain a knowledge of naterials. They learn to moid, to east and to plane, bore and drill eastings by machine tools. Wrought iron and steel are worked by them at the forge, and tempering, brazing and soldering are thoroughly learned. In view of the success of the St. Louis school, Chicago has raised $100,000 for the establishment of a similar institution. This education of the hands has not been
